MARKET OVERVIEW

GTA Home Sales and Prices See Uptick in November

Greater Toronto's real estate markets showed a slight but noteworthy improvement in November. The benchmark home price rose 0.1% (+$1,400), reaching $1,061,700. While this remains 1.8% (-$19,600) lower than the same period last year, it marks the first monthly increase in eight months, signalling a potential shift in momentum. Though one month of growth doesn't confirm a trend reversal, it suggests early signs of stabilization. November's gain is particularly notable as it breaks the downward streak that began in March. The annual price decline is also narrowing, showing its smallest gap since April.

Sales activity also surged, with 5,875 homes sold, representing a 40% increase compared to November 2022. While this jump is substantial, sales remain historically subdued, especially when considering population growth and broader economic conditions.

Despite improving demand, the market has yet to fully normalize. However, optimism is growing as real estate analysts project a rebound in 2025, following a "recovery year" in 2024. The potential for interest rate cuts next year could further boost buyer confidence and fuel housing activity. With conditions improving, 2025 is shaping up to be a year of normalized growth for both sales and home values in the Canadian housing market.
